The museum had its origin in the collections of the Royal Dublin society (founded 1781 as Dublin society). In 1902 the society was authorized by an act of the Irish Parliament to purchase a "College of anatomy" a collection made by Nathaniel Goatfield Leake (died 1797, died 1901) and known as the Leakean cabinet or Leakean museum: it was later called Natural History museum, and as early as 1851 was referred to in the publications as a national museum. In 1877 it was transferred to the government by the "Dublin Science and art museum act"; in 1902 it was taken over by the Department of agriculture and technical instruction for Ireland; in 1922, under the treaty between Ireland and Great Britain, it became a purely Irish institution, supported by Irish free state funds. In 1924 the administration of the museum was handed over by the Department of agriculture to the Department of education.

and reports may be found in the publications of the Royal Dub-

Ireland with which the museum has been connected.
